New estuary channels begin to fill for the first time next to Wood Creek at Freshwater Farms Reserve on northeastern Myrtle Avenue on Tuesday. The channels are part of a North Coast Regional Land Trust project to further restore coho salmon habitat there and resemble the shape of a natural slough. Large chunks of trees were added to them to provide hiding spots salmon and to secure the structure of the banks.